Category:SkyrimThe role of diet in reducing the risk of chronic disease: a public health perspective. It is now widely accepted that a diet high in saturated fat and cholesterol causes and accelerates the development of atherosclerosis and coronary artery disease. Diet modification, however, is the most cost-effective approach to reduce the risk of chronic disease. Dietary guidelines and recommendations have been developed to advise individuals on the type of diet which may reduce the incidence and severity of the complications associated with coronary artery disease. The major dietary influences on the development of chronic disease are a diet containing a high level of refined carbohydrates and a diet high in saturated fat. A diet high in polyunsaturated fat and fiber is also protective, but the evidence is less clear. Diet is the most important determinant of blood cholesterol concentrations. Although there is good evidence that a diet high in saturated fat increases blood cholesterol, the evidence that the incidence of coronary artery disease can be substantially reduced by modifying the diet to reduce the dietary cholesterol intake is less convincing. A review of the literature indicates that weight loss, exercise and limiting alcohol intake may also reduce blood cholesterol concentrations. There is no convincing evidence that any of the other recommendations of dietary guidelines can reduce the incidence or severity of atherosclerosis or coronary artery disease. There is good evidence that the incidence of atherosclerosis can be reduced by restricting dietary cholesterol intake. The evidence that cholesterol-lowering diets are effective in reducing the incidence of coronary artery disease is equivocal. The best means of reducing the risk of coronary artery disease is by developing healthier lifestyles, such as reducing the consumption of saturated fat, refined carbohydrates and alcohol.Cannabis use by patients in primary care: a systematic review and meta-analysis. We aimed to summarize the extent and characteristics of cannabis use by adults in primary care settings. We conducted a systematic review and meta-analysis of observational studies on the association between cannabis use and health outcomes and determined prevalence of current cannabis use in primary care. A systematic search of PubMed, EMBASE, Cochrane database of systematic reviews, Cochrane library of systematic reviews, CINAHL, and PsycINFO was conducted to October 2014. t678ea9f9e
